As long as you aren't disparaging the original artist, parodies are completely legal. They must have some social/political significance. I believe Robin Thicke was actually trying to comment on this very issue, which is why he went out of his way to be as offensive as possible (the mylar balloons, the syringe, and the use of the goat). Unfortunately because women are portrayed like this all the time, nobody got it. Most people, women included, think the video is "sexy" and the girls are flirty...totally missing the point of what Thicke was trying to do. He said because he and TI were married with kids, they were the perfect guys to do this type of thing. Uh, that's like saying I should be able to use the N word because I have black friends. I'm writing new lyrics about douchebag guys who use the game and are a little bit "rapey" not in reference to Thicke but in reference to this cultural issue. I want this video to be part of my comedy channel launch on YouTube. I need two woman who can play TI and Pharrell. Someone needs to be able to rap. I have someone to shoot it with a great camera but I will need help with recording the lyrics. And sound in general. Amy, Deirdre, and Amy, how do you want to be involved? Could we have a meeting together to organize? Who else would like to be involved?

Consult a lawyer but Weird All Yankovich did it all the time though usually I think he gets permission on some level- kind of like an honor to be parodied in a way.

Melinda, that was exactly my thought. Can we use the song if words are changed? I'm in.

Melinda! I was just thinking that we should do a parody! Because if we tweet, etc. about that video it would just invite people to watch it. Not our goal. Awesome, I'm in.
